

I do not want the FCC to delay the deadline for mobile phone service providers to implement portability of individual phone numbers. Mobile phone users should be able to keep their phone number when changing to a different service provider. Other countries already have portability established. Stop delaying the deadline as it is not a technological matter but rather an economic issue. Service providers want to hinder people from changing to a different plan, so they require users to give up their phone number in the hope that they won't leave. Is this a fair practice in a free market? I don't believe it is.
